Historical Note

St. Joseph College traced its origins to Saint Elizabeth Ann Seton, who founded St. Joseph's Academy in Emmitsburg, MD in 1810. Around the turn of the 20th century, the Academy petitioned the Maryland General Assembly for a college charter, which was granted on February 26, 1902. Although a continuation of the curriculum of the Catholic, all-women's Academy, it now could grant accredited baccalaureate degrees. It was operated by the Daughters of Charity for the entirety of its existence.

The College continued to expand from its origins as St. Joseph's Academy. In 1920, the Verdier Building was completed, and in 1926, two new dormitories and the Vincent Building were completed, the latter having classrooms, administrative offices, and the DePaul Auditorium. The curriculum was designed in the 20th century Catholic liberal arts model.

Beginning in the 1960s, students could enroll in courses at nearby Mount St. Mary's College if they were not offered at St. Joseph College, and vice-versa.

The college campus also contained the provincial house of the Daughters of Charity until 1965, when it moved next-door to the newly constructed St. Joseph's Provincial House.

Due to the drop in enrollment that came from a decrease in popularity of single-sex education and the drop in vocations to religious communities in the late 1960s, St. Joseph College graduated its final class in 1973. In 1979, the U.S. Fire Administration purchased the property as the site of the National Fire Academy, which is now operated by the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) of the United States government.
